The Canal of Panama was officially opened on August 15, 1914, after 30 years of construction, and became a major factor in world trade. The United States began the next attempt in 1904. Workers built a 50-mile canal with three massive locks while battling sweltering heat and tropical diseases. The U.S. introduced a sanitation campaign that eradicated yellow fever and reduced malaria and bubonic plague outbreaks in the isthmus. In 1930, the U.S. Panama Canal Zone was returned to Panama, and the new Panama Canal Administration was given to the Panamanians. The Panama Canal is now owned and operated by the Panamanian government. The Panama Canal is a vital link in world shipping, and its importance cannot be overstated. It is a major route for international trade and a source of economic growth for the region.
